Almost three years after the pleasant surprise that was their first album “Far From Perfect”, the Spanish duo formed by Iván Oubiña and Raúl Mon are back. As if they wanted to let us know that the worldwide crisis hasn't even scratched their musical creativity, they bring us a splendid 5-track EP, which goes by the name of “Tape Worms”. In this new offering, it looks like 6PM has been consciously polishing every single song detail, toying around with textures and adding a great array of nuance to each song. Managing to give yet another spin to their ever-contagious song constructions, they still seem infallible in the precious arts of assembling sounds as if they were part of a puzzle, of twisting rhythms like a spindle, and more importantly, to fit in each one of them in their splendid melodies (or, as it's the case here, one of Swedish songwriter José González, whom they cover in an wonderful “Down The Line” reconstruction.)

6PM's songs never seem to explode with embellished fireworks. They do so without even an always annoying dust cloud, it almost looks as if they self-implode. In fact, it's the way their songs seem to resolve in an almost tantric manner that differentiates them from the few that dare to approach pop from an electronic perspective in Spain. We could almost say that 6PM are an oasis inside a music scene that desperately needs to get rid of the clichés that is gagging it, in order to be able to open itself towards new horizons.
